My Experience in Creating a Portfolio Website

At the time, I was working on a collaborative final project for my second semester of school, and one of the assignments was to create a portfolio website. Honestly, I was a bit confused and hesitant at first because I had never built a website myself from start to finish.

Finally, I started slowly, thinking about the design concept. I chose a minimalist style with sky blue because I thought it looked cooler and more pleasing to the eye. After that, I started creating the website structure using HTML, then added CSS, JavaScript, and Bootstrap to make it more appealing.

Over time, the website began to take shape. I added sections like Home, About, Skills, Experience, and Contact to make it more structured. I also added images and animations to make the website look more lively.

However, during the process, I encountered some difficulties, especially when adjusting the layout and fixing errors in the CSS. It was quite frustrating at times, but I tried to find solutions online and kept trying until I finally succeeded.

After finishing, I double-checked the website and made sure it displayed well on various screen sizes.

Ultimately, I felt proud that I had successfully completed this portfolio website. From this experience, I learned many new things and became more confident in my abilities. I found this to be more than just a chore, but a truly memorable experience.
